Liberator and Hero of Two Continents:

Januarius Aloysius MacGahan

(Concluded, from Vol. XXVII, No. 8)

by J. Michael Finn, State Historian
Ancient Order of Hibernians

The Hero Returns Home

During the war, MacGahan had met Lieutenant Francis Vinton Greene, an American army officer, who was serving as military attaché to the U.S. legation at St. Petersburg. Greene traveled with the Russian army as an observer. A fast friendship developed between MacGahan and Greene. Greene became ill with typhus and was sent to Constantinople to recover. An already ailing MacGahan went to Constantinople to assist in the care of his friend. Greene recovered but MacGahan came down with the disease and died on June 9, 1878. Ambassadors, generals and fellow journalists attended his funeral, which was conducted by Dominican friars. MacGahan was buried in the Catholic cemetery at Feirkeni on the Asian bank of the Bosphorus near Constantinople.

MacGahan's story did not end with his death. In 1884 Ohio Legislator Henry C. Greiner of Perry County sponsored a resolution petitioning the U.S. Secretary of the Navy to send a warship to Constantinople for the purpose of "conveying home the remains of Mr. J. A. MacGahan." Soon after, Greiner and a delegation of six senators and representatives from Ohio traveled to Washington to meet with Navy Secretary William Chandler. General Philip Sheridan met Chandler in New York, accompanied him back to Washington to meet with the Ohio delegation and gave his considerable support to the resolution. MacGahan's wife, Barbara, was also at the meeting with Chandler. The group found that Chandler was very supportive and willing to make the unique arrangements to return MacGahan's remains to the U.S.

The arrangements were as follows: the warship USS Quinnebang, already anchored off Constantinople, would take MacGahan's remains as far as Lisbon, Portugal, then transfer the sealed coffin to the USS Powhatan, which would then bring it to New York City.

On July 30, 1884 the Powhatan steamed from Lisbon Harbor bearing the remains of MacGahan and on August 26 arrived in New York. The coffin was transferred to a government yacht and transported to the Brooklyn Navy Yard. There to greet the yacht were MacGahan's wife Barbara, his brother Patrick, H. C. Greiner, Navy Secretary Chandler, Secretary of War Robert Todd Lincoln, and Navy Commander Winfield Scott Schley. Members of the New York Press Club escorted MacGahan's coffin to City Hall. The procession route was lined with thousands of mourners. The coffin, draped in an American flag, was taken to the Governor's Room of City Hall where it was viewed until late in the afternoon by hundreds of New Yorkers. It was then transported to Pennsylvania Station and placed on the express train for shipment to Columbus.

The coffin arrived in Columbus on August 27, 1884. A formal procession, mostly military, met the train at the Union Depot. The coffin was placed in a hearse and the procession moved down High Street to the Ohio State House where a memorial service was conducted. A prayer by Colonel Anderson was followed by a few remarks from Columbus Mayor Charles Walcutt on behalf of the city and from Governor George Hoadly for the State. The coffin then lay in state in the capitol rotunda, surrounded by a military guard of honor. All state offices were closed and the public was admitted for viewing.

The next day, the coffin was shipped to Zanesville, Ohio. MacGahan's brother, Patrick, and the members of the Ohio Legislative committee continued to accompany the body on its trip to Zanesville. A group that included members of the Hazlett Post of the G.A.R., the 17th Regiment Ohio National Guard, and representatives of the Zanesville Press Club received the casket. The casket was placed in a hearse drawn by four horses. It was taken to the rotunda of the Muskingum County court house where the remains were laid in state until the next morning, when the casket was transported to a vault at Calvary Cemetery until it was time to move the coffin for the last leg of the trip to Perry County.

On September 10, 1884 the coffin was transported by train to New Lexington, where it was placed in the courthouse for public viewing. The next morning, shortly after 8:00 a.m., the coffin was transported to St. Rose Catholic Church where a Requiem Mass was offered. Attending these services were MacGahan's mother Esther, his brother Patrick, his wife Barbara, and his 10-year-old son Paul. A huge throng of people also attended (all standing room was occupied with thousands stood outside the church). A choir of Dominican friars provided the music for the Mass. Rt. Rev. John A. Watterson, Bishop of Columbus, delivered the sermon. Bishop Watterson referred to MacGahan as "The liberator of Bulgaria and the hero of two continents." The Bishop remarked on the responsibility that members of the press had to God and to the public. He elaborated on the power of the press and the need for the press to be guided by conscience in the exercise of that power. He mentioned that, in the quest for profits, the press often paid too little attention to the truth. He noted that MacGahan had been successful because he was "always truthful and conscientious in his work and never given to treachery, bias of opinion, or unreliable statements." The Bishop stated that MacGahan had been confirmed by Archbishop Purcell and remained a true Catholic unto his death. This commitment to his religion marked and guided MacGahan in his work.

The Catholic Columbian reported that the voice of Bishop Watterson "was one of grave sweetness with a lingering tone that penetrated and set the air vibrating to the utmost limits of the auditorium. There is not space to say half that presses to be said of this remarkable effort in church oratory." It was also noted by several reporters that the Bishop spoke the eloquent sermon without the use of notes. Regrettably, no shorthand copy of the sermon was made and no written copy of the sermon exists.

Following the Mass procession to the cemetery was formed outside the church. As in Columbus, the procession was primarily composed of military units, military bands, and members of the press. The procession was reported to be over half a mile in length. Also included were the Governor of Ohio, other State officials and members of the General Assembly. Members of the press made up most of the pallbearers (James W. Newman, Ohio Secretary of State; Lecky Harper, Mt. Vernon Banner; James T. Irvine, Urbana Democrat; T. M. Gaumer, Zanesville Signal; C. N. Allen, Bellaire Democrat; and Samuel Flickenger, Cincinnati Enquirer, D. L. Bowersmith, Ohio State Journal; and Edward Davenport, Logan Republican).

It was an extremely hot day and a recent drought left the road to the cemetery very dusty. Because of the heat many choose not to walk the distance to the cemetery and a few of those who did became ill from the heat. At the gravesite Father Philip Meschenmoser, pastor of St. Rose parish, and Father Gerhard Hormisch, Chaplain of St. Aloysius Academy, performed the burial rite (they may have also been celebrants at the Mass). A banner suspended from an arch over the grave read, "Rest in Thy Native Land."

The graveside services being concluded, a program of speakers was begun. E. S. Colburn delivered a eulogy and Colonel W. A. Taylor read an original poem. An address by Judge Silas H. Wright of Lancaster followed and was described as being quite lengthy. General James M. Comly of Toledo was scheduled to deliver an address but was unable to do so due to ill health. According to some reports, the speeches at the cemetery were not well received by the crowd. This was likely due to the combination of the oppressive heat, the long walk to the cemetery, and the considerable length of the speeches.

Later that afternoon, Barbara MacGahan, her son Paul, Mrs. Esther MacGahan, and Patrick MacGahan received hundreds of visitors at the New Lexington home of John Ferguson, who was chairman of the organizing committee.

It was estimated that between 12,000 and 15,000 people were in attendance at the services in New Lexington that day. One of Ohio's heroes had been returned to his native soil. Further ceremonies, tributes, and monuments would follow in New Lexington over the years. A statue of the correspondent was erected across from the New Lexington Court House. An annual commemoration ceremony is still held in New Lexington on the weekend closest to the correspondent's birthday.

In Bulgaria, a commemorative bust of MacGahan can be found in the village of Batak, and an annual Mass is offered in his memory in the ancient cathedral in Turnovo. Many of his writings have been translated into Bulgarian and several streets are named after him in Sofia and Plovdiv. Unfortunately, today, MacGahan's name is nearly forgotten in his home state of Ohio. His books are rapidly decaying in a few university libraries and you will likely not find his name on any listing of famous Ohio writers.

MacGahan, however, provided us with an excellent summary of his own life in a letter to his mother that was written on March 17, 1877. He wrote, "I have become rather famous since last summer, and have had more to do with the Eastern Question than ever I thought possible. I can safely say that I have done more to smash up the Turkish Empire than anybody else - except the Turks themselves. Besides this I have fought several pitched battles with the English government, and the English embassy at Constantinople. And come off victorious each time. You never thought I was such a desperate character, did you?"
